It's a cursed mountain—a hill in the limestone of India, with a top that will not settle. It's home to a forest full of cobras and an Udungo tribe—the headman is also known as the Mountain Witch. The only way to make a living is by cutting down trees and selling wood. But their life is interrupted when another man from nearby lands nearby with his own wooden statue, offering help in return for protection from the witch that they've been destroying their dwellings. They're contracted by Kinjhite traders passing through on their journey, offering them gold and cloth in exchange for protection from her wrathful powers. It seems like a good deal. But Manjhi's wife betrays her, fearing the witch more than her husband. Eventually, he comes across a great construction of stone, high above the mountain road. Back home, his wife is frantic with worry, but he can't be dissuaded from finding out what this fortification is for. It's a fort of magnificent proportions—and it's not made by human hands...
